Thinking Your Situation Isn't Worth a Case

You may think right now that your harassment or discrimination isn't worthy of an employment law case. Going over the details of your case with a lawyer is the only way you can know where you stand. Don't assume that you shouldn't try. Let a lawyer help you.

A photograph of two men in a casual setting. One man, wearing a light blue button-down shirt, is seen from the side, looking towards the other man. The second man, wearing a dark blue patterned polo shirt, is smiling broadly and looking back at the first man. The background is a blurred outdoor area with greenery. A large green diamond-shaped graphic is overlaid on the top right, and a white diamond-shaped graphic is overlaid on the bottom left.

Getting Legal Advice from Family and Friends

Your family and friends are your support system. They are not your lawyers. They cannot give you legal advice. The only person you should go to for legal advice is your lawyer.

Not Following Your Employee Handbook

You likely have an employee handbook. If you have complaints of harassment or discrimination, you should do everything that your employee handbook says. All of your actions should be documented. Your lawyer can help you utilize these documents.

Waiting too Long to Talk to an Attorney

You have a limited amount of time in which to bring an employment law case. Do not delay. You should do your research to find the right attorney, and then get in touch right away.

Talking to the Wrong Attorney

There are a lot of attorneys out there who may not be the right fit for you. Make sure you are working with an attorney you trust. You should have confidence in their abilities. Don't settle for somebody who doesn't know how to handle your case.

Not Reporting Incidents at Your Work

If something happens at work and you feel unsafe or uncomfortable, make sure you tell your supervisor or an HR manager. Document any and all incidents.

Being too Afraid to Try

You have a right to try to win an employment law case. You have been hurt in this situation and you deserve justice. Don't let the fear of retaliation stop you from pursuing a case. We will protect your rights.
